This event will explore how established advocacy organizations are embracing and channeling the student and youth energy in politics, and how new technologies help and harm these dynamics.

We'll hear from a panel that includes leaders in youth advocacy, experts in civic engagement, and the folks who developed MAPLE. The panel will also explore MAPLE's potential to transform how youth engage in civic and legislative processes.

We welcome all who are interested in utilizing technology to strengthen our democracy, or want to learn how MAPLE might effectively amplify their voice in state politics.

MAPLE aims to transform the act and impact of legislative testimony by making it easy to submit online comments to legislative committees while simultaneously generating an open-source web archive of submitted testimony from our neighbors.

MAPLE is the work of a group of volunteer technologists at Code for Boston and has been incubated by Northeastern University School of Law's NuLawLab. We are a nonpartisan, open source and nonprofit (501c3) project operating under Open Collective and supported by Partners in Democracy.
